No, that's not quite accurate based on standard insurance terminology, but it's a common point of confusion. Let me clarify the relationships step by step, using a simple example to illustrate how these terms typically interconnect. Insurance structures can vary by type (e.g., health, auto, life) and region (e.g., Hong Kong's MPF or health plans), but the general hierarchy holds.

1. Typical Hierarchy: Policy → Plan → Coverage

- One Policy → Tied to One Plan: A policy is usually linked to a single plan. The plan acts as the "blueprint" or package that defines the overall structure, and the policy is the personalized contract that activates it for you. You can't typically have multiple plans under one policy—each policy is issued for a specific plan. If you need coverage from different plans (e.g., health + life), you'd get separate policies or a bundled policy that combines them under one umbrella (but it's still considered one overarching plan).
- One Plan → Multiple Coverages: A plan defines a set of multiple coverages (benefits/protections). Coverage is the "what's protected" part—e.g., hospital stays, outpatient visits. Plans bundle these into tiers (e.g., basic vs. premium), so one plan can include 10+ coverages with varying limits.

2. Detailed Example: Health Insurance in Hong Kong

Imagine you're buying voluntary health insurance (VHIS) from an insurer like AIA.

- The Plan: You choose a "Standard Plan" (e.g., AIA's VHIS Flexi Plan). This is a predefined package with options like room/board limits ($800/day) and surgical benefits (up to $100,000). The plan is not unique to you—it's offered to all customers and defines the rules.
- The Policy: Once enrolled, you get Policy #AIA-123456, effective Jan 1, 2026, for you and your family. This policy references the "Standard Plan" but adds your details (e.g., premium $500/month, deductibles). One policy = one plan here—you can't mix "Standard" and "Premium" plans in the same policy; you'd need a separate policy or upgrade.
- The Coverage: Under your policy (via the plan), you get multiple coverages, e.g.:
  - Hospitalization: Up to $1M/year.
  - Outpatient: $500/visit, 20 visits/year.
  - Dental: $2,000/year add-on.

  One plan = multiple coverages—these are the benefits activated by the policy.

If you want "multiple plans," you'd buy separate policies (e.g., one for health, one for life). Bundled products (e.g., "Family Protection Plan") might feel like multiple plans but are technically one policy with sub-coverages.

3. How to Distinguish and Avoid Confusion

- Policy: Your personal contract (unique ID, start date, premiums). Ask: "Is this my legal agreement?"
- Plan: The product type or tier (shared by many). Ask: "What package of benefits did I choose?"
- Coverage: The specific protections (multiple per plan). Ask: "What risks are insured and to what limit?"

In short, one policy typically ties to one plan, and one plan includes multiple coverages. If your setup differs (e.g., multi-line insurance), it might bundle plans under one policy, but that's the exception. For advice on your specific insurance, check your documents or consult an advisor! 😊
